Abstract — Veer Teja Ji or Tejaji is a Rajasthani folk deity. He is considered one of the major eleven incarnations of Shiva and worshipped as a deity in whole (Rural & Urban) Rajasthan. Veer Teja was born around 1074 in Khadnal, Rajasthan, India. His parents, Ramkunwari and Tahar, were Jats. Legend has it that Teja died in 1103. The story says that he died because of snake bite, he allowed a snake to bite his tongue, that being the only unwounded area of his body. In return, the snake promised that no person or animal would die from a snakebite if they sought the blessings of Teja. People in Rajasthan particularly call upon this promise on Shukla tenth of the month of Bhadrapada, a day that is set aside for marking his death. Anthropologists say the Tejaji following sect is protagonist that includes an element of protest against the caste system. In September 2011, India Post released a commemorative stamp depicting Tejaji. A Rajasthani language movie titled Veer Tejaji, based on the life of Tejaji, was made in the 1980s.

Introduction
Veer Tejaji was a great warrior, and exceptional social reformer and folk-deity of Rajasthan, who is worshipped in Northern Indian states. He was from Rajasthan, the land of Rajputana, famous for many heroic events, heroic stories, and unheard examples where people put their lives and families at risk and kept the pride and upheld moral values like freedom, truth, and loyalty above their lives. Veer Teja Ji was among such heroes and unarguably one of the most famous persons in the history of Rajasthan.[1]
Veer Tejaji is the most famous folk-deity who lived in Rajasthan. As per historians, he was born on Friday, Magha Shukla 14 samvat 1130 (29 January 1074). He was born in the family of Dhaulya gotra Jats. His father’s name was Chaudhary Tahar, a chieftain of Khirnal in Nagaur district in Rajasthan. His parents were ardent worshippers of Bhagwan Shiva. It is said that his mother Ramkunwari went to Tyod and worshipped Nagaraja for the birth of her son. She got a boon from Nagaraja and delivered a boy who had an exceptional aura, that’s why he was named Teja. Tejaji married Pemal, who was a daughter of Raimal of Jhanjhar gotra, who was a chieftain of Paner. She was married to Tejaji in the early childhood when she was only 6 months old and Tejaji was just 9 months old. Their marriage took place at Pushkar Ghat on Pushkar Purnima of 1074 AD. She was able to meet with Tejaji only in the last days of her life and became Sati when Tejaji died fighting with the enemies for the protection of cows. It is said that Pemal’s mama Khaju Kala of Jayal was not in favor of this relationship and had enmity with the Dhaulya family, which led to a massive dispute and Tejaji’s father Tahar Dev killed Khaju Kala with the sword.[2,3]

In Rajasthan, it was a tradition that chieftain of a specific clan or a village had to initiate the ploughing of fields after the first rains in Jyeshta (May-June) month. Due to some urgent work, Tejaji’s father and brother were out of the village and as this was first rains, his mother asked him to perform ploughing in the fields. Tejaji went to fields and started his work.[4,5]

His Sister in law bring food for him but somehow got late, which angered Tejaji. To counter Tejaji’s anger, she taunted him and said that he is incapable of bringing his wife Pemal from her father’s home and it is shameful for him. This provoked Tejaji a lot and he decided to bring his wife from his in-law’s home. Tejaji was also instructed to bring his sister Rajal first so that she can receive Pemal on her first arrival to Kharnal. When Tejaji was on way to village Tabiji to bring his sister, he was attacked by Meena sardar. There was a war and Tejaji defeated Meena sardar and reached village Tabiji, got permission of her sister’s husband Jogaji Siyag and brought Rajal to Kharnal. The next day he started his journey to Paner to bring his wife Pemal back. It was a difficult journey, but he crossed all the rivers running full of water due to heavy rains at that time. He reached Paner by evening and entered his in-law’s house. His mother-in-law was engaged in milking her cows and due to Tejaji’s sudden entry, the cows got disturbed. His mother-in-law could not recognize Tejaji, and with seething anger, she cursed him that he be bite by a black snake as he has disturbed her cows.[6,7]

Tejaji got angry over this comment and decided to return without Pemal. However, there was a girl named Lachha Gujari, who was a close friend of Pemal. She decided to set up a meeting of Pemal with Tejaji. She met Tejaji and gave Pemal’s message that if Tejaji does not come she will die. She also conveyed that Pemal’s parents had decided to re-marriage her with some other person. Upon listening to this ordeal, Tejaji came to Paner to meet Pemal. While they were talking with each other that they heard knock of Lachha Gujari. Lachha told Tejaji that thieves have taken away all her cows and nobody is ready to help her. Tejaji was filled with anger and mounted his mare ‘Lilan’ and started alone to fight with dacoits, who had taken away Lachha’s cows. Tejaji found that dacoits who had stolen the cows of Lachhan Gujari were Meena Sardar’s people. Tejaji, who was made for helping others, decided to bring those cows back as soon as possible. The myth is that he encountered a snake burning in the fire that was saved by Teja. That snake cursed Teja and wanted to bite Teja. In fact, he had encountered a Nagavanshi chieftain Basak Naga, and he had a war with him. He promised to come back after bringing his wife Pemal. He was badly wounded in the process to bring Gujari’s cows back from dacoits.[8,9] Veer Tejaji was a man of his words. While returning he kept his words and produced himself before the snake. The snake did not find an unwounded place on the body of Tejaji, so he offered to bite on the tongue. Teja died due to snakebite on 28 August 1103. Historical facts are that while Tejaji was returning from Paner with his wife he was attacked jointly by Meenas, who were defeated earlier, and Nagavanshi chieftains. Tejaji and his wife fought bravely with the sword. Tejaji was killed in the war and Pemal became Sati at a place called Sursura. Tejaji’s sister Rajal had also become sati which is a unique example of sister becoming sati in Indian history. Basak Naga, who killed Tejaji was very much pleased with him as he kept his words. Basak Naga gave a boon that Tejaji would be a deity of Kaliyuga, would be worshipped in every house. [10] Veer Tejaji was a great saint and we can see a huge number of temples of Veer Tejaji across Rajasthan. It is believed that if a person suffering from snakebite goes to the samadhi of Teja or puts a chord (tanti) in Tejaji’s name, he is cured. Tejaji is a demigod with the power to spare from death any snakebite victim who ties an amulet in Tejaji’s name. And to this day the priests of Tejaji’s temples go into trance and suck the poison out of snakebites and then tie a thread around the wrist or ankle of the victim. And it is believed that no one so treated will die from the bite.[11]

To remember the bravery and sacrifice of veer Tejaji, several fairs are held in temple towns that have temples dedicated to Tejaji on the occasion of Teja Dasmi (Bhadrapada Shukla Dashmi) in various cities of Rajasthan, Madhya Pradesh, and Haryana. Tejaji martyred himself on Bhadrapada Shukla Dashmi in V.S. 1160 (Saturday 28 August 1103 AD) fighting with the enemies for the protection of cows at Sursura, Kishangarh, Ajmer. Sursura is considered as Mukti Dham. A large fair, Mela Tejaji, Takes place on the eleventh lunar day of Bhadrapad Shukla Paksha (Aug.-Sept.) every year in village Parbatsar, District Nagaur in Rajasthan.[12]

Discussion
Rajasthan is rich in folk lore. There are innumerable narratives, songs, bhajans, dance-dramas, painting schools and bardic singers depicting the heroic feats of the folk – deities which form a strong tradition of an alternative faith which is rooted not as much in spiritualism as in the material and worldly aspects of the lives of the devotees. Popular among the masses these folk deities were those heroic individuals who served selflessly the cause of the people in their lives and because of their valour, virtues and sacrifice became dear to the people. These persons were then worshipped by the masses and assumed the status of Gods and Goddesses. Tejaji is one of the major folk deities of Rajasthan[13,14]. The exact date of his birth is not known but the traditional records maintained by the Bhaps of their clan reveal that he was born in the village Khadnal of Nagaur Pargana in Marwar in Dholya sub-caste of the Jat community in 1073 A.D. (Bheru Bhat ki Bahi, Degana) His father was Tahadji and the name of his mother was Ramkunwari. He was married to Pemal, the daughter of Raimal Jagi of Paner village. There are references of Tejaji getting married five times before he married Pemal. There are other sources which put it slightly differently. Veer Tejaji, according to the sources, was born on Friday, maghashukla 14 samvat 1130 (29 January 1074), in the family of Dholyav Gotra Nagvanshi Jats. His mother’s name was Sugna. Mother Sugna is believed to have got son Tejaji by the blessings of Naga-deity. [15] The life of Tejaji is known for his courage and bravery displayed in saving cows from plunderers. Also, he is known for his determination to keep his word. He would not let his promise unfulfilled. In the pursuit of these, he made the supreme sacrifice and laid down his life. The narrative of his bravery in rescuing cows appears in literary forms, especially in folk songs. Since the literary sources about the feats of Tejaji have origin in the oral tradition, there is no author who can be identified as the source of information. The songs and folk narratives have been compiled at a very later stage by scholars, therefore a number of narratives with slight differences in the course of events, details of dates and places occur in various texts.

One of the narratives describes the story of Tejaji’s feat of rescuing cows as follows. There was a tradition in that area, the chieftain had to initiate the ploughing of fields after first rains. Tejaji's father and brother were out of the village at first rains so his mother asked Tejaji to do the halsotiya in the fields. Tejaji went to fields and started ploughing. His sister-in-law (bhabhi) became late in fetching his food locally called Chhak, which angered Tejaji. On Tejaji's expressing his anger she taunted that his wife was in her father's home and it was shame on his part. This prompted him to go to bring his wife from in-laws. His sister-in-law (Bhabhi) asked Tejaji that before he brings his wife Pemal, he should bring his sister Rajal so that she can receive Pemal on her first arrival to Kharnal. Tejājī was married to Pemal in early childhood at Pushkar with the daughter of Rai Mal Jat of Jhanjargotra, chieftain of village Paner. After marriage there was a dispute between two families in which māmā of Pemal and father of Tejaji were killed. Tejaji did not know that he was married. When Tejaji was on way to village Tabiji to bring his sister, he was attacked by Meena Sardar. There was a war and Tejaji was victorious. He reached village Tabiji, got permission of her sister's husband Jogaji Siyag and brought Rajal to Kharnal. Next day early in the morning he mounted his mare Lilan with palāṇ and started journey to Paner to bring his wife Pemal. It was a difficult journey, but he crossed all the Rivers running full of water due to heavy rains. He reached Paner by evening. At that time his mother-in-law was milking cows. The cows got disturbed due to Tejaji's brisk entry on his mare. His mother-in-law could not recognize Tejaji and cursed him that he be bitten by a black snake as he has disturbed her cows. Tejaji got angry over this comment and decided to return without Pemal.[16]

LachhaGujari was a friend of Pemal. Her house was about two kilometers from Rupangarh. LachhaGujari helped Pemal to meet with Teja. For this Lachha rode on camel and went to Teja facing many clashes with Meena sardars en route. Lachha reached Teja and gave Pemal's message that if Tejaji does not come she will die. Parents of Pemal had decided to get her married with some other person. At this time Pemal was attempting suicide but was saved by Lachhan. Tejaji came to Paner and saw her there. Pemal was a beautiful and attractive girl. They were talking with each other that they heard knock of Lachha Gujari. Lachha told Tejaji that thieves had taken away all her cows and there was no body to help. Tejaji mounted his mare Lilan and started alone to fight with dacoits, who had taken away Lachha's cows. Tejaji found that dacoits who had stolen the cows of Lachha Gujari were Meena sardar's people. Tejaji, who was made for helping others, decided to bring those cows. The myth is that he encountered a snake burning in fire that was saved by Teja. That snake cursed Teja and wanted to bite Teja. In fact he had encountered with a Nagavanshi chieftain and he had a war with him. He promised to come back after bringing his wife Pemal. He was badly wounded in the process to bring Gujari's cows back from dacoits. Veer Teja was man of words. While returning he kept his words and produced himself before the snake. The snake did not find unwounded place on the body of Teja so he offered to bite on tongue. The snake bit on his tongue which caused his death on 28 August 1103. (Wikipedia) While Tejaji was returning from Paner with his wife he was attacked jointly by Meenas, who were defeated earlier and Nagavanshi chieftains. Tejaji and his wife fought bravely. Tejaji was killed in the war and Pemal committed Sati at place called Sursura. Tejaji's sister Rajal had also committed sati. In other narratives it is stated differently. The cows of Lachha Gujari are stated to be stolen by Mers. Gurjars are a community of peasants and cowherds. Their main occupation is rearing cattle. They are one of the backward communities of Rajasthan even today. When Gurjars approached Tejaji and requested him to rescue the cows driven away by the Mers, he was going to fetch his wife Pemal from her parental village back to his home. He immediately decided to rescue the cows first.[14,15] In this pursuit he had to fight a tough battle with the Mers and was fatally wounded. There are a number of stories associated with this act of valour and ultimate death of Tejaji. All these stories, however, depict an incidence of snake bite at the tongue of Tejaji finally leading to his death. These stories are narrated in a number of folksongs and hymns which are sung at the shrines and temples. constructed at various places in central, western and eastern Rajasthan.

Each of these narratives depicts his taking up of the responsibility of rescuing the cows, preferring it to his domestic responsibility and successfully accomplishing the heroic task of liberating the cows. It may be treated as a sign of his religious faith, but more than being so, it is his sense of duty towards his fellow beings. As a member of the peasantry, the economic worth of cows as a source of livelihood is equally important to him. Another feature that appears prominently in all the narratives is his commitment to honour his word. He returns to the snake, though wounded, to fulfil the promise that he had made to the snake. These kind of heroic characteristics are found in almost all heroes who are sung in oral literature. This can be understood as a trait of personality of those unlettered heroes who belong to a society where the script could not reach due to various socio-economic and political reasons. According to another tale when Tejaji was going to his in-law’s place, he tried to save a pair of snakes. The snake was saved but his paramour could not be saved. He grew furious and wanted to bite Tejaji. Tejaji promised the snake that he will return to him after visiting his in-laws and then the snake could bite him. After reaching his in-laws he got injured while trying to rescue the cows of Lachha Gujari. Still he did not forget his promise. He went to the snake. All parts of his body were full of wounds. The snake asked where to bite.[12,13] Tejaji then offered his tongue. The snake bit him on his tongue and he passed away. In yet another tale, it is said that as a cowherd Tejaji used to drive his cattle to the grazing grounds. In the fields, he observed that one of the cows used to get estranged and reached near a hole from where a snake used to come and drink the milk. When Tejaji came to know of this, he promised to offer milk to the snake every day. Once, somehow he forgot to do so. The snake grew furious and wanted to bite him. He said that he will return to him after visiting his in-laws and then the snake could bite him. When he returned, he was wounded so much that the only place left was the tongue where the snake bit Tejaji and as a consequence he passed away. One more tale which appears more realistic narrates the battle with the Mers and states that Tejaji was seriously wounded and he fell down at a place where a snake was present. The snake bit him on his tongue which caused his death. Tejaji passed away at a place called Sursara near Kishangarh. A temple was built at that place and a cattle fare used to be held every year. But in 1734 A.D. during the reign of Maharaja Abhay Singh of Jodhpur, the chieftain of Parbatsar took the statue of Tejaji from Sursara, Kishangarh to Parbatsaran and installed it there. Since then Parbatsar is the main shrine of Tejaji.[13,14] Every year for ten days in rainy season (From Bhadrapad Shukla 5-15) a cattle fare is held in which traders, peasants and devotees of Tejaji gather in huge numbers. Similar fares are held at his birth place Khadnal, Sursara, the place of his death, Beawer and Chittorgarh. His temples are found, besides other places, at many places in the erstwhile states of Bundi, Ajmer, Kishangarh and Chittorgarh. In fact, almost every village in Rajasthan has a small place of worship called Devra with the icon of Tejaji riding a horse, with a naked sword in his hand, his wife by his side and a snake biting at his tongue. Similar figurines carved on leaf-shaped silver plates are worn by the Jat peasants round their neck.[15] Folk deities of Rajasthan are worshipped by the masses across regions and religions. There are songs, hymns, plays and folk form of oral literature like “Katha”, “Khayal” and “Beawal”. Tejaji is worshipped almost all over the state. On the tenth day of the month of Bhadrapad people organize the recital of “Beawala” of Tejaji, some others organise his “Katha” and at places people play his “Khayal” depicting important events of his life. Hundreds of people gather to watch these performances. Besides these, numerous songs depicting the valour, determination and promise-keeping are sung in the peasantry. The songs describe his life-style, his love for the peasantry and cattle-rearing communities, his promise made to rescue cows, his willingness and ready acceptance to fight the Mers, his promise made to the snake and the supreme sacrifice he made to honour his word. They also depict his domestic chores. In the rainy season when the peasants begin to plough the fields, they begin by singing the songs devoted to Tejaji called Teja-ter. They have a belief that this will be a good omen for the crops and the yield will be good. The peasants are able to identify themselves with Tejaji as their lives are also like that of Tejaji. They have to undergo situations similar to those faced by Tejaji. Therefore the songs are a source of inspiration for the worldly life, the daily chores that they are involved in. They do not relate to the spiritual world, the idea of emancipation or the supernatural. Tejaji is worshipped as an icon of human virtues and even when the devotees approach him through his worship it is to gain some material accomplishment. Like Gogaji, another folk deity of Rajasthan, Tejaji is also worshipped as a god of snakes. There is a popular belief that if a string of Tejaji called Tejaji ki Tant is tied to the right leg of a person bit by a snake, the poison does not affect him. Such a person is, then taken to a shrine of Tejaji and after proper offerings and prayers, the string is cut. In some of the songs sung by women, Tejaji is requested to remove the effect of the poison of Black Cobra. Another song narrates that just by taking the name of Tejaji the poison of the snake in victim’s body loses its effect.[16]

Dr. Kalyan Singh Shekhawat, an expert on Rajasthani language, literature and culture talks of the folk deities of Rajasthan, “These folk gods and goddesses have never been supernatural creatures, but were a part of this human world and they devoted their lives for the welfare of the society. That is why they were also called “Peer”. They were the ideals of their time and attained such height that they were treated as gods and goddesses. They are men as well as women like Ramdevji, Pabuji, Tejaji, Hadbuji, Mallinathji, Gogaji, Bheruji, KesariyaKanwarji, Mehaji, among gods and Satiji, JeenMataji, Karniji, and Nine goddesses of the Charans. Folk deities have been described as “Peers”:

Pabu, Hadbu, Ramdev, Mangaliya Meha, Paanchu Peer Padharjyo, Gogajijeha

The couplet welcomes the folk deities namely Pabuji, Hadbuji, Ramdevji, Mangaliyaji, Mehaji and Gogaji. They are all addressed as Peer which literally means “An old wise man”. [17]

Conclusions

Tejaji belonged to a Jat family which is a community primarily of peasants. In Rajasthan, agriculture is supported and supplemented by animal husbandry and therefore cattle are unconditionally regarded as important an asset as land is. Therefore Tejaji’s popularity as a deity roots from his selfless sacrifice to rescue cows. Another deity Gogaji also died while rescuing cows though in his case the cows belonged to him only and he died defending them against his own kith and kin. He is also revered by the peasantry and a string with nine knots called “Goga – Rakhdhi” is tied to the plough and at the wrist of the plougher in the hope of better crops. Like Tejaji, Gogaji is also associated with snakes and it is said that just by remembering Gogaji as a “Jahir Peer”, the poison loses its effect. Wherever Tejaji’s temples and shrines exist, annual fares are held. At Parbatsar, the main shrine of Tejaji, a cattle-faire is held. Fares are a very important embodiment of the cultural and economic life of a region. The fares are occasions of expressing collectively the faith, beliefs, joys and interests of people. In the case of festivals the rejoicing is more confined to individual families or communities while fares are more carnivalesce in nature. The fares are occasions of expressing collectively the faith, beliefs, joys and interests of people. In the case of festivals the rejoicing is more confined to individual families or communities while fares are more carnivalesce in nature. There is greater intermingling of heterogeneous populations across class, caste, religion, gender and political affiliation. The economic activity becomes primary though people gather in the name of a deity, their activities revolve round economic and social concerns. Tejaji’s fare at Parbatsar is a huge cattle fare. For ten days cattle- rearers from far and wide gather at Parbatsar with thousands of cows, oxen, camels, horses, donkeys and mules etc. which are bought and sold there. It is a huge trade fare for peasantry where nowadays agricultural equipments, high yielding varieties of seeds, fertilizers and pesticides are also available. These fares underline the importance of livestock in the life of rural Rajasthan. Nagori Oxen, Sanchori cows, horses and camels from Gudha Malani are famous in the region. These days hybrid species are also available. Dr. Kalyan Singh Shekhawat writes about these fares, “They have cultural value but their economic significance also cannot be ignored. Cattle have been described as wealth. It is also a sign of one’s prosperity.[16]”

Tejaji and other folk deities, besides being icons of the faith of peasantry have also played a role of social reformers. There are several historical evidences that society was then divided into social strata determined by caste and there were many communities which were treated as untouchables. These folk deities adopted a very liberal and cordial attitude towards these communities and unlike the orthodox Brahminical order, allowed them all religious freedom to be a part of their faith. Most of the folk deities, thus became presiding deities of the toiling masses and helped the peasantry in particular to assert their identity and independence.[17]
